Peaceful assembly and freedom of opinion, expression in Iraq*

The fundamental status of the Right to Freedom of opinion, expression and peaceful assembly is enshrined in the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Article 19 of the Declaration that: “[E]veryone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference[...].”¹ Article 20(1) additionally protects the right for everyone to freedom of peaceful assembly and association, which in the case of Iraq is continuously violated by legal restrictions.

The International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) furthermore specifies the rights to freedom of expression and opinion and the right to freedom of assembly in its Articles 19, 21 and 22. Article 21 most importantly highlights that “[n]o restrictions may be placed on the exercise of this right other than those imposed in conformity with the law and which are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, public order, the protection of public health or morals or the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.”

Peaceful assembly and demonstrations in Iraq

Iraq has been the scene of widespread peaceful demonstrations. Since December 2012 the peaceful protests continued and expanded to other regions in Iraq, uniting hundreds of thousands of participants and encompassing a wider range of demands, including the provision of basic services and the end of corruption and human rights violations. In general, the demonstrations are a response to increased frustration with the general deteriorating conditions that Iraqis are forced to endure on a daily basis. The protests started through the discovery of the ill-treatment of female prisoners and continued with additional demands such as:

- to put an end to the application of the death penalty in the current context of lack of independence of the judiciary
- to stop applying the laws that has been used systematically against certain opponents or group of the Iraqi society²
- to cancel the Military Operation Commands in all Iraqi provinces and suppress all non-constitutional security apparatus, to withdraw the army from cities and residential areas in Iraq and to remove concrete barriers restricting the freedom of Iraqi people
- to ban the use of sectarian criteria as a basis for employment in State’s institutions, and to ban the use of sectarian slogans and phrases in all state institutions as well as in the media and schools
- to stop conducting random night raids, arrests should happen at day-time and with respect to all legal standards
- to accelerate the formation of the Supreme Federal Court, to ensure the independence of the judiciary and standards of due process

Government’s response to peaceful demonstrations

Despite the existing international norms and standards protecting freedom of assembly and expression, the government has responded to these peaceful protests with excessive violence.

Since the onset of the demonstrations in December 2012, and during previous protest campaigns, the Iraqi government has constantly referred to demonstrators as “terrorist”. As early as 1 January 2013, the Prime Minister gave an interview in which he earned groups against continuing demonstrations.³

² Among these laws are the so-called “accountability and justice” law, which is the extension of the “De-baathification” Law introduced into the Iraqi judicial system by the US occupying power in Iraq, has been used systematically as a tool to suppress political opposition and discriminate against large parts of the Iraqi society.

³ The interview can be seen at: <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=q1ihgG2Tj1w&feature=youtu.be>

On 18 August 2013, the Iraqi Prime Minister promised in a speech to end all demonstrations against the political processes in Iraq and declared that the government was capable of putting an end to any demonstrations in less than an hour. Additionally, a joint committee was established by the government in early 2013, responsible to investigate the demonstrators' demands, which ended up to this day in no results.

In August 2013, the Ministry of Interior stated that it was aware of the planned peaceful demonstrations however demanded the postponement while warning the organisers of possible "terrorist attacks" and the importance of national security. This pretext of alleged terrorist attacks has been continuously used to postpone, cancel or prohibit demonstrations as well as arbitrarily detain protesters and convict them on "terrorist charges".

Although Article 38, para.3 of the Iraqi constitution guarantees the right to freedom of assembly and demonstrations, the Ministry of Interior has yet to approve every request for any planned peaceful demonstration.

The UN Assistance Mission for Iraq (UNAMI) stated in a report released in August 2011, that "incidents of abuse and torture remain widely reported", and recommended to "ensure compliance by security forces, police and all officials engaged in law enforcement and justice with the requirements of international humanitarian law and human rights law in combating armed violence."⁴ Significant problems still remain with law enforcement and the administration of justice, especially with regards to respect for due process and fair trial standards.⁵ These recommendations go perfectly in line with the demonstrators' demands.

Furthermore, High Commissioner of Human Rights Navi Pillay has stressed in her opening speech to the 23rd session of the Human Rights Council that it was essential that the Iraqi Security Forces exert restraint in maintaining law and order during peaceful demonstrations.⁶

This is an important issue which is directly linked to the Anti-Terrorism Law No.13 of 2005, that permits the detention and punishment of those suspected of terrorist activities. This law is the main pretext for targeting and restricting peaceful protests. The use of counter-terrorism rhetoric has provided government authorities with the alleged reason to target, attack and arbitrarily arrest, detain and execute innocent civilians.

Media organisations and journalists who report on protests or advocated human rights are regularly further targets of politically motivated threats and attacks.

Demonstrations

On 4 and 7 January, 2013, Iraqi army officers opened fire on peaceful demonstrators in Mosul. The Governor of Nineveh province confirmed that security forces shot at demonstrators in an attempt to disperse them. Furthermore, civilians who simply attempted to reach the peaceful protests at Al-Ahrar square in Mosul were pursued and targeted by army officers.⁷

Further demonstrations have been regularly taking place in the Anbar region, including Fallujah. On 25 January 2013 a peaceful sit-in protest in Fallujah was interrupted by open fire from army forces, killing a total of 9 and injuring over 60 additional civilians. Witnesses claim that the security forces fired directly at the peaceful protesters, whereas the soldiers state that their shots were targeted into the air and unintentionally killed and injured demonstrators.

One of the most tragic and violent cases of the government's restrictions on these fundamental rights of freedom of assembly and opinion was seen in April 2013 in Al-Hawija, during which around 200 protesters were killed, wounded or arrested.

Over a period of several days in April 2013, around 4000 peaceful demonstrators protested against the government's repeated disrespect for human rights in the Hawija/Kirkuk province in Iraq. At a certain point during the demonstrations, the protesters found themselves surrounded by armed governmental troops that prevented all access to food, water and medical aid. Access to all forms of media including journalists and news casters were also prevented and their equipment confiscated. The army and militias stormed the area and attacked the peaceful protesters who were authorised by the mayor of Kirkuk to hold these demonstrations.⁸ An ambush was launched by army and SWAT forces, during which heavy and indiscriminate shootings, using live ammunition, tanks and helicopters, targeted the peaceful protesters and killed over 80 demonstrators and injured an additional 200 civilians. Forces were also reported to have attacked the injured and set fire to civilian vehicles.

This was not the first time that demonstrators have been subjected to threats, attacks and violence by Iraqi government forces. Since the onset of December 2012, demonstrators have been continuously harassed and targeted by government forces. The right of freedom to assembly has been strongly restricted in the name of fight against terrorism.

*"It's ironic that officials suggest that using force to block peaceful demonstrations will assist Iraq's 'march to democracy'. The authorities can ban demonstrations if they believe they will be violent, but here the concern seems that protests will be politically embarrassing or inconvenient."*⁹, the acting Middle East Director of Amnesty International, Joe Storck, commented on the government's reaction towards the planned demonstrations in August 2013.

In August 2013, Interior Ministry officials refused to issue permits for two concurrent groups organising demonstrations, without providing them a reason. Organizers of both demonstrations told Human Rights Watch that they are concerned that Iraqi security forces will use force to block what they said would be peaceful demonstrations, and may arrest and intimidate organisers should the planned demonstrations take place.¹⁰

Hundreds of civilians continue to be killed every month in violent attacks by armed groups across Iraq. Their perpetrators commit grave breaches of human rights, however this ongoing violence must not be used as a pretext by the government to restrict and prohibit peaceful demonstrations in any public space anywhere in the country. The right to freedom of assembly and expression must be protected under international human rights law and as set out in the Iraqi constitution.

In order to have an official justification to act against continuous peaceful demonstrations, the Iraqi Prime Minister thus declared protest camps as infiltrated by terrorists even if such claims were never proven to be true.

In December 2013, army troops launched an operation in the province of Anbar, where some Al-Qaeda camps are said to be located in the desert. Based on the fact that the majority of the population in the area has always been as much in the opposition to al-Qaeda as they had been against the occupation, several tribe leaders expressed their willingness to support this fight against the notorious terrorist organisation. Suddenly the army moved close to the cities and turned against the protesters, claiming that they were not just a place for recruiting terrorist but for sheltering them too.¹¹

Iraq's legislation on demonstration permits

Iraqi law does not clearly state what authority regulates demonstrations, including granting permits. The Baghdad provincial council is authorised to issue permits for demonstrations in Baghdad under regulations that the previous governor issued in 2011.¹³

As a state party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), Iraq is obliged to protect and promote the rights to freedom of expression, association, and peaceful assembly and consequently, authorities may only restrict the right to assembly in exceptional and narrowly drawn circumstances. Iraq's granting of approval authority to government officials breaches the narrow criteria that international law prescribes for restricting the right to assembly. It furthermore breaches Article 38 of Iraq's constitution, which guarantees the right to "freedom of assembly and peaceful demonstration."

The ruthless military attacks against civilian demonstrators by the government forces are in serious violation of all fundamental human rights and must immediately be put to an end. The right to freedom of assembly and peaceful demonstration is a fundamental right that must be respected and promoted in national legislation.

Recommendation

The NGOs signatories to this statement recommend to

- The SR on the rights to freedom of peaceful assembly and of association and the SR on freedom of opinion to submit a detailed report to the HRC on the above mentioned violations
- Establish an independent international committee to investigate the HR situation in Iraq after 2003
- Appoint an UN Special Rapporteur on the HR situation in Iraq
